

Smith's bombers in sixth raid

RHODESIAN warplanes again attacked a Zimbabwe refugee camp in Mozambique yesterday, in the sixth bombing raid by Smith regime forces into black Africa in 11 days.

Zambia has been attacked three times, Mozambique twice and Angola once. Each time, the Smith regime has claimed that the attack was on guerilla camps, but it later emerged that all the attacks were on refugee camps.

A Smith regime spokesman said in Salisbury: "If the Mozambique government wishes to act as host to forces seeking the overthrow of the transitional government by force, and to provide such forces with accommodation and storage facilities, then they must be held responsible for the risks to which such a policy exposes the people of Mozambique."

In Nairobi, Zimbabwe Patriotic Front leader Robert Mugabe appealed for more aid from the Organisation of African States and said his forces especially needed anti-aircraft weapons to counter Rhodesia's air power.

He said the Patriotic Front had neutralised the Rhodesian infantry and the Salisbury regime now relied on its air force.

Mr. Mugabe again alleged that South Africa supplied modern Mirage planes which were being used by Rhodesia.

"The frequent use of these aircraft," he said, "especially against soft civilian targets in the front-line states, is proof that our own anti-aircraft weaponry is not effective enough against sophisticated Mirages."

Mr. Mugabe said that many OAU members could provide such weapons and training, but few had helped over the years. "What, one may ask, is the revolutionary duty of the others to our struggle?" he said.

Repeating his charge that South African jets were used last Monday in a raid on a guerilla base in Angola, he said. "It is clear that the Mirages used in Angola were South African and the base used for launching and refuelling was South African. The necessary reconnaissance could only have been undertaken by South African pilots.

"The pilots of the Mirages involved must surely have been South African, for Rhodesia owns no Mirages."
