I...active in its own country; in one...attack, two weeks ago, a train was...passengers killed. Last week Dr Ruth First, a prominent member of the South African Communist Party and the African National Congress, was killed by a letter-bomb in Maputo. Dr First had been involved in organizing a conference supported by the United Nations; last March, failure of the South African military authorities to restrain their men from adventures inside Zimbabwe — in an area not far, either, from Mozambique — was a major sin of omission by South Africa.

Exile movements and some African politicians tend to attribute all acts of terrorism and sabotage in the region to South Africa; even where there are no traces whatever agency, said in a report from Maputo Portugal's embassy had received an official note from Mozambique's Ministry of Agriculture saying the raid on Namaacha, about 80 km west of Maputo, had been the work of "South African commandos".

Initial reports of the raid described one of the raiders as a White soldier with his face painted black, but later reports said all the attackers had been Portuguese-speaking Blacks.

According to Anop, the Mozambicans said investigations into the action were nearing completion, but gave no further details.

Mr Antonio de Figueiredo, reported working for Mozambique's Ministry of Agriculture in the area, was killed by gunshot as he answered a knock on his door during the raid.

The Namaacha attack came two days after Mozambique President Samora Machel said South Africa was waging an "undeclared war" against his Marxist Government and five days after a parcel bomb killed South African exile Ruth First at her Maputo office. — Sapa-AP.
