TOMORROW 120 Mozambican military trainees are expected to arrive at the Nyanga training camp, the first group in the expanded scheme agreed to earlier this year.

It was then agreed by Zimbabwe, Britain and Mozambique that the number of Mozambicans trained at the camp should be increased from 180 to 360 a year. The Mozambicans undergo three-month courses.

To cater for the doubled numbers, Britain has sent three extra officers and three sergeants to boost the team of Zimbabwean and British instructors, a spokesman for the British High Commission said yesterday.

One of the new officers has previous service in this part of the world, having served with the Commonwealth monitoring force at independence.

The British Military Advisory and Training Team grew out of this monitoring force and has been helping train Zimbabwe National Army troops since 1980.

In February last year the joint Bnatt/ZNA training course at Nyanga for junior Mozambican officers started. The course that starts tomorrow will be the fifth and largest of the intakes.
